

June through September

Current needs one midwife for June 21st – July 11th

We need one more midwife in July and two midwives for August

We need one midwife for the first half of September.

Hired midwives will replace both local and southern midwifery staff that is on holiday or on leave. Together with local staff, you will participate in the functioning of the maternity and whenever possible, in the ongoing education of students.

We also need midwives to work over the winter holidays.

We are looking for experienced midwives to commit to regular locums for 2-6 months per year in one of the three village maternities. This is to provide improved continuity and to help develop our midwifery education program. Together with local staff, you will participate in the functioning of the maternity and serve as a mentor/instructor helping to develop the education program according to the ongoing needs of the students and their communities

The Inuulitsivik Maternities:

Local and 'southern' trained midwives have been providing complete maternity, well-woman and well-baby care to the Inuit communities of the Hudson Bay Coast since 1986. Experienced local midwives and midwifery students provide services in Inuktitut. Midwifery education is based on a community-centered apprenticeship model, which strives to combine both traditional and modern ways of knowing and learning. In the fall of 2008, the Quebec Ministry of Health together with the Order of Quebec Midwives (OSFQ) granted recognition to Inuulitsivik's Midwifery Education Program and its traditional learning pathways, offering full licensure to its graduates. Midwives from across Canada, the United States, Greenland, Scandinavia, France, England, Germany, and the Middle East have participated in the education program. The WHO, ICM, CAM, NAHO, and the SOGC have identified Inuulitsivik's combined midwifery service and education program as an appropriate and realistic model for aboriginal and remote communities.

Each village maternity was initiated by and continues to take direction from the people of its community. Prior to the creation of these services, two generations of women were separated from their families and sent to Moose Factory (Ontario) to have their babies with people who did not share their language or cultural background. The effects of these evacuations were devastating not only for the families, but for the entire community. Now, most women on the Hudson Coast give birth to their babies in their own communities, their own culture and language, and with family and friends.

The Inuulitsivik Health Centre Maternity in Puvirnituk has been serving women and families for over 30 years. It is located in a wing of the Health Centre and serves its own village population and that of the smaller villages that do not yet have midwives. Puvirnituk midwives also receive and provide care during birth for women whose medical and social situations require additional or more specialized care than can easily be given in the more remote villages. The Inukjuak Maternity opened in 1996, and the Salluit maternity began training students in 2004. These maternities are located in the CLSC (nursing stations) and serve the women and families of their respective villages. Women who have a normal pregnancy and birth history have the opportunity to stay in their village to have their babies.

The reality of a remote northern region requires a larger scope of practice in both emergency care and community health than in southern midwifery practices. Midwives work in collaboration with medical and nursing staff and community service workers.

Working in the North is both challenging and rewarding. It is an opportunity to support the Inuit community in their efforts to regain autonomy for defining health and health care, and to reclaim birth as a normal and important community event.
